

Anti-Feminist lawyer sues Australian Feminist reporters.

New York City attorney Roy Den Hollander filed suit in the New York State Supreme Court on March 24 against Tory Shepherd and Amy McNeilage, reporters for The Advertiser and The Sydney Morning Herald, respectively.

The lawsuit charges the two reporters and their papers with publishing “injurious falsehoods” about Den Hollander and “interfering with a prospective economic advantage” of his. In January, both reporters published articles that resulted in the University of South Australia deep-sixing a male studies course in which Den Hollander was to teach a section on “Men and the Law.”

According to Den Hollander, “These two yellow, female-dog-in-heat journalists used their power as reporters to do what weak-minded ideologues have done throughout history—employ personal attacks to prevent the spread of knowledge and ideas that they disagreed with.”

“They conducted a high-tech book-burning because they lacked the patience and will to review the contents of the online course they opposed. Neither of these two even bothered to interview me before they published their initial article.”

“If these two Feminist book-burners had not jumped on their broomsticks and scared the bejesus out of the administrators at the University of South Australia, students there would have had an opportunity to acquire information and consider views not available anywhere else in Australia’s higher education.”

Den Hollander continued, “In the U.S. in the 1950s, Senator Joseph McCarthy and Roy Cohn also used opprobrious accusations in order to restrict dissent and political criticism—as did the witch hunters of yesteryear, only today it is the witches who are doing the hunting with pogroms against non-conformists who do not genuflect to Feminism and political correctness.”
